New TV Show Focuses On Growing Diabetes Epidemic

(NAPS)—Howard Steinberg, a successful marketing entrepreneur diagnosed with diabetes at age 10, wants to make life easier for Americans with diabetes. That's particularly good news considering that according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, one in three Americans born in 2000 will develop diabetes. Of the over 18 million Americans with the disease, 88 percent are not managing it to minimal standards and over five million don't even know they have it.

Steinberg is the creator of "dLifeTV," an entertaining new diabetes lifestyle show—with a serious mission. Diabetes is a leading cause of heart and kidney disease, blindness, amputation and even death. Awareness, education and motivation to manage the condition can help many avoid these catastrophic consequences. "A TV show about diabetes is not only a breakthrough; more importantly...it will save lives," said Steinberg, who has successfully managed his diabetes for 36 years and knows how much work and support it takes. "The time has come to wake up America."

Nicole Johnson Baker, Miss America 1999 and author, who is also living with diabetes, is one of dLifeTV's co-hosts. She agrees that the show will help people with diabetes and those around them understand and better manage the illness. "Diabetes is not easy," said
